

SAMPLE REPORT / EN

Emma's next move

Where your strengths, values and the market meet, and the routes that follow from it.

cairn /kɛərn/ noun

a mound of rough stones used to mark a trail, route, or summit, guiding travelers by showing the way forward, especially where the path isn't otherwise clear.

What's inside

ABOUT YOU

 Executive Summary

 Your Approach

 Your Strengths

 Development Areas

 Career Values

CAREER SUGGESTIONS FOR YOU

1 Primary Career Match

Service Designer · Large agency / consultancy (201-1000)

2 Second Career Match

Employee Experience Consultant · Large agency / consultancy (201-1000)

3 Third Career Match

Design Sprint Facilitator · Own company / boutique practice

 Runner-up Careers

3 alternatives

 Outside the Box

3 unconventional paths

 Dream Job Assessment

2 dream jobs

CHAPTER ONE

About you

Your working profile: how you operate, what you are good at, where the friction is, and what you actually value. Everything in the second half is built on this.

FROM YOUR REPORT

“ You operate as a builder, someone who gets energy from turning ambiguous problems into structured plans.

Executive Summary

Want to share this? Pick a different line and get a ready-made card at cairnly.io/dashboard

PERSONALITY RADAR

5 axes

How you actually work

Your operating profile across five dimensions, built from the assessment and pressure-tested by your coach.

For further details regarding this graph, consult your dashboard.

OVERVIEW

Executive Summary

The short version of everything that follows: what your profile points to, which roles came out on top, and the first move worth making.

INPUT REQUIRED

To generate an accurate Executive Summary, I need the candidate's actual assessment data. Please provide:

1. Approach & Values – how they work, what motivates them, leadership tendencies
2. Strengths – top capabilities identified by the assessment
3. Development Areas – growth areas flagged, plus any user pushback/disagreement from the chat
4. Career Recommendations – ranked list of matched careers with rationale (top matches, runner-ups, outside-the-box options)
5. Chat Feedback/Reactions – any strong positive or negative reactions the user expressed toward specific careers or traits during the conversation

Once you share these details, I'll write the full Executive Summary following the structure and rules above. Here's a placeholder example using illustrative data so you can see the intended output:

👤 Professional Identity

You operate as a builder, someone who gets energy from turning ambiguous problems into structured plans. Your leadership style leans collaborative rather than directive: you influence through clarity and preparation, not authority. What drives you most is visible progress, seeing an idea move from whiteboard to shipped product.

🚀 Key Strengths & Growth Areas

Your standout capability is systems thinking, the ability to hold multiple moving parts in your head and spot where they'll break. Communication under pressure is your growth edge, though you pushed back on the assessment's suggestion that you avoid conflict entirely, noting you simply prefer to address it privately rather than in group settings. That nuance matters and softens the original framing.

📌 Career Direction

Your top match is Product Manager, where your systems thinking and preference for structured ambiguity align directly with the role's demands. Operations Strategy Lead follows closely as a strong runner-up, leveraging the same planning instincts in a less customer-facing context. An outside-the-box option, Technical Program Manager, surfaced as a compelling fit given your comfort translating between technical and business audiences, something you confirmed resonates during the chat.

🗺️ Path Forward

Start by testing the Product Manager path through a smaller-scope project or cross-functional initiative before committing fully. Prioritize building a track record of public communication, since that's the gap between where you are and where these roles need you to be. You have the raw thinking skills already; the work now is visibility.

Send over the real profile data and I'll tailor this precisely.

🔗 ABOUT YOU

Understanding Your Approach

How you navigate challenges, lead teams and engage with the people around you, and what that means for the environments where you do your best work.

🧑 Personality and Interaction Style

Emma, you gravitate toward rooms where ideas get tested out loud: workshops, strategy decks, customer interviews. But your conflict style splits down the middle. With peers you say you address disagreements directly, yet your instinct in negotiation is to concede for harmony. That's not indecision, it's a hierarchy: you'll push hard on ideas but soften fast on relationships, which explains why you're the one people bring a messy deck to and trust it back.

🏠 Impact in Different Environments

The pattern pays off wherever the work is generative and social: your agency years, your happiest by far, were built on new problems every few weeks and rooms you could read and move. It costs you in environments built around defending numbers rather than shaping direction, which is exactly what's eroding your current role.

💡 Key Insight

Your happiness scores rise and fall with proximity to the story, not with title or budget size. The fintech job gave you the broadest scope of your career and your second-lowest score, because scope without storytelling authority isn't the thing you actually want.

⚡ ABOUT YOU

Strengths and How to Grow Them

What sets you apart professionally, and how to put more weight on it.

🌟 Identifying Your Core Strengths

Underneath the skills list sits one capability: you find the sentence that makes a messy situation legible to other people, whether that's a product, a decision, or a friend's dilemma. The repositioning work, the insight programme the product team now leans on, the friends who come to you before a big decision: all the same move, applied to different material.

↗ Leveraging Strengths in Your Career

This is diagnostic work disguised as marketing work. Given your pull toward impact and away from research-heavy, spreadsheet-driven tasks, the version of this skill worth building isn't deeper marketing specialization, it's applying that same sense-making to bigger, messier human questions, wherever they sit.

💡 Key Insight

You've spent fifteen years being hired for marketing titles while your actual value has been translation: turning what people do into a story an organization can act on. That's a harder thing to replace than a marketing function, AI-assisted or not, because it depends on judgment about people, not on producing the copy itself.

📈 ABOUT YOU

Areas for Development

The areas where focused effort makes the biggest difference to the goals you named. Not weaknesses, but the things currently costing you the most.

🔗 Understanding Potential Growth Areas

Perfectionism, self-criticism, and over-owning responsibility feed directly into each other: Emma, you set an exacting bar, carry the burden alone, and doubt yourself when the result feels imperfect. In practice, this dynamic leads you to ship work early and then continuously polish after release, because your internal meter rarely registers a project as completely finished.

📌 Implications for Your Growth

When exploring a meaningful pivot, this ongoing cycle risks stalling your momentum more than any gap in capability. Uncertainty around your next move can amplify self-criticism if you rely purely on internal judgment to determine when something is done. A concrete external checkpoint offers the best counterweight: name a specific check-in partner and agree on a milestone before diving into the work, giving yourself an objective standard for completion.

💡 Key Insight

Your response to external critique stems from that same high bar. You tend to take feedback deeply to heart, absorbing targeted notes as sweeping evaluations of your judgment. Grounding critiques in their specific, tactical context keeps revisions productive without depleting your energy.

Your reflection on AI eroding your distinct craft points to an essential truth: as automated tools handle baseline execution, your intuitive judgment about people and what genuinely resonates with them remains your strongest, least replicable asset.

♥ ABOUT YOU

Aligning with Your Values

What matters most to you in your work, and how that shapes which roles will actually fit rather than merely look good.

🕒 Identifying Your Core Values

Impact outranks growth, and growth outranks autonomy, which is a specific order: you want to matter to something before you want independence in how you get there. That tracks with your dream of running a research studio for organisations, but it sits oddly next to your best year, the agency, which offered you autonomy and challenge with the thinnest cause attached of any job you've held.

🗨️ Values in Career Decisions

Any next role needs a visible line from your work to a person or outcome you can name, plus room to run the sense-making yourself rather than defend it in dashboards. It needs to exclude data-heavy, spreadsheet-first work and solo, low-contact tasks, both of which you've flagged directly as drains.

💡 Key Insight

You rank impact highest, yet your happiest year ran on craft and momentum with little cause behind it at all. That tension suggests "impact" for you may mean the felt sense of changing how people understand something, not a mission statement, which opens more doors than a strict cause-driven search would.

CHAPTER TWO

Career recommendations

Roles matched against the profile in chapter one. Your top three first, then close alternatives, then the unexpected directions and a reality check on your dream job.

FROM YOUR REPORT

“ The agency structure (project pods, peer support) also protects against what's currently draining you at 5/10, the dashboard and re-forecasting grind that keeps pulling you away from positioning and storytelling.

Service Designer

Want to share this? Pick a different line and get a ready-made card at cairnly.io/dashboard

TOP THREE COMPARED

How your top three stack up

The same three roles measured against the working conditions you said matter most.

- 1. Service Designer
- - 2. Employee Experience Consultant
- - - 3. Design Sprint Facilitator

For further details regarding this graph, consult your dashboard.

 TOP MATCH · 01

Your strongest match, based on your personality, values and skills. What the work involves, why it fits, and what to be honest with yourself about.

Service Designer

Large agency / consultancy (201-1000)

 MATCH · 90%

 AI · MODERATE

 UPSKILL

Overview

A service designer researches how people actually experience an organization (front and back stage), then redesigns the systems and touchpoints behind that experience so it works better for everyone involved.

Why this role fits you

Helping others and making an impact sits at the top of what drives you, and this role turns that into a daily practice: you're not writing a mission statement, you're sitting with 30+ people a year to find out what's actually broken in how an organization treats them, then fixing it. That's the same instinct that made your customer-insight programme something the product team leans on more than marketing does.

This role extends your 8/10 Brand Strategist pattern almost exactly: a new client problem every few weeks, a workshop, a deck that makes a room go quiet. The agency structure (project pods, peer support) also protects against what's currently draining you at 5/10, the dashboard and re-forecasting grind that keeps pulling you away from positioning and storytelling. Your perfectionist streak gets useful external checkpoints here instead of spiraling.

What you'll actually do

- Run discovery research. Conduct contextual inquiries and stakeholder interviews, the same muscle you built doing 30+ customer interviews a year.
- Build service blueprints. Turn messy, chaotic input into a visual map a whole company can rally around, exactly what you did with your outcome-led repositioning work.
- Facilitate co-creation workshops. Your AJ&Smart sprint training and room-reading instincts get used weekly, not occasionally.
- Present to leadership. Translate research into a narrative that moves skeptical stakeholders, drawing on your storytelling craft.

The Reality Check

- ⚠ Conservative clients slow the work down. Convincing corporate stakeholders to embrace organizational change (not just a new campaign) takes more patience than agency brand work did, and your harmony-seeking conflict style could mean conceding ground too early.

⚠️ Blueprinting is a genuine skill gap. You have the research and facilitation down cold, but formal service blueprinting and target operating model artifacts are new territory. Realistic path: shadow 2-3 live projects and take a short service design certification (e.g. from a recognized service design school), roughly 2-3 months to get fluent, not years.

⚠️ Proposal crunches will test your flexibility rule. Client pitch deadlines surge unpredictably. With a partner on nursing shifts, you'll need to negotiate which weeks you protect early with your team.

The practical stuff

Money: £50,000-£75,000. This sits at or slightly below your £50k-75k bracket midpoint, comfortably within target, though senior consulting rates in London agencies often flex upward once you're placed.

Schedule: Standard agency hours with surges during discovery sprints and pitches. Your flexible-hours requirement is workable here since agencies increasingly support hybrid, but sprint weeks will test it occasionally.

Energy: High client and colleague interaction, daily, inside small project pods. This matches your "somewhat energized, but I have a limit" profile precisely because pods (not open-floor exposure) contain the interaction.

Growth: Leads to Lead Service Designer, then Design Director or Strategic Design Partner, a real ladder toward running research-driven change work.

How AI will impact this role

Moderate. AI now handles qualitative coding, persona synthesis, and first-pass blueprint visuals, the grunt work that currently eats your week. Strategic stakeholder alignment and ethnographic empathy, your actual edge, stay human. Given your "moderately familiar" AI comfort, this role hands you a natural on-ramp rather than a steep climb.

Future-proof skills

- Own the synthesis layer: Get fluent directing AI tools for interview coding so you spend saved hours on judgment calls, not data cleanup.
- Build workshop-facilitation depth: Deepen live, high-stakes facilitation skill (skeptical execs, dominant voices), the part no AI tool touches.

Alignment with your ambitions

Your short-term goal is new skills in a different setting, and this delivers formal service design methodology on top of what you already do well. Your long-term ambition, contributing to a cause and running your own research studio, makes this less a detour and more a credentialing platform: 2-3 years here builds the blueprinting and org-design chops that make your own studio (your stated dream job) more fundable later.

 TOP MATCH · 02

Your second match. Close to the first in overall fit, but different in focus, environment or trajectory.

Employee Experience Consultant

Large agency / consultancy (201-1000)

 MATCH · 84%

 AI · HIGH

 UPSKILL

Overview

An employee experience consultant researches how staff actually feel about their workplace, then designs journey maps and interventions to fix culture, tools, and processes that aren't working.

Why this role fits you

Your happiest professional years weren't about the industry, they were about the shape of the work: a new problem every few weeks, a workshop, a deck that made a room go quiet. This role extends your 8/10 Brand Strategist pattern by keeping that exact rhythm and swapping the subject from customers to employees, which plays directly into your top value of helping others and making an impact.

It's the same diagnostic instinct you've already proven, sitting in customer interviews to spot which story a company tells itself, just pointed inward at organizations instead of outward at markets. The structured consulting milestones and pod-based teams also guard against the isolating grind currently deflating you at 5/10 in your fintech role, where dashboards have crowded out the storytelling work you're actually good at.

What you'll actually do

- Run sentiment audits. Conduct qualitative focus groups on workplace culture, a direct extension of your customer-interview synthesis skill.
- Map employee journeys. Build journey maps and interventions using the same synthesis method that shortened your last product's sales cycle by 20%.
- Present roadmaps to CHROs. Your stakeholder management and storytelling craft carry the strategic narrative into the boardroom.
- Facilitate steering committee workshops. Use your workshop facilitation training to build consensus among competing executive priorities.

The Reality Check

-  Client politics move slowly. Executives resistant to progressive culture change will stall projects for months, and your instinct to over-own client outcomes (a known tendency for you) makes that slowness personally frustrating rather than just a process fact.
-  Scope creep is structural. Multi-stakeholder enterprise projects invite constant "can you also look at..." requests. Protecting boundaries here matters more than in agency brand work, where scope was tighter.

⚠ Domain shift is light but real. Your journey-mapping skill transfers almost directly, but you'll need context adaptation, HR tech familiarity (Workday, Culture Amp) and organizational psychology framing. Realistic path: one short course plus your first live project, about 6-8 weeks to feel fluent, since your interview and synthesis skills already do the heavy lifting.

📦 The practical stuff

Money: £52,000-£80,000. This lands squarely inside your £50k-75k bracket, and the top end exceeds it, so this hits your target without a pay cut.

Schedule: Standard consulting hours with predictable milestone peaks. More predictable than agency pitch cycles, which works better against your flexible-hours requirement.

Energy: High daily interaction with client HR leaders and multidisciplinary pods. Sits within your "somewhat energized, with a limit" range because the pod structure distributes the social load.

Growth: Leads toward Practice Lead for Employee Experience, or eventually an in-house Chief People Officer track, a genuine leadership runway.

🤖 How AI will impact this role

Substantial, per the enriched data, though the human core (reading organizational politics, building executive trust) resists automation. AI increasingly handles sentiment data crunching and first-draft journey maps; your job shifts toward interpreting what the data actually means for a resistant executive team. Your moderate AI familiarity means you'll want hands-on time with sentiment analytics tools early, not later.

🛡 Future-proof skills

- Learn HR analytics tools: Get working fluency in Culture Amp or Workday reporting so you direct the data instead of waiting on analysts.
- Sharpen executive influence: Build a repeatable framework for landing "non-intuitive" recommendations with skeptical CHROs, your real differentiator as AI handles more analysis.

🎯 Alignment with your ambitions

This fits your short-term goal of developing new skills in a different setting, applying your marketing toolkit to organizational psychology. Against your long-term ambition of significant societal contribution and running your own research studio, this is a genuine bridge (not a detour): it builds people-focused consulting credibility that translates directly if you eventually go independent.

🏆 TOP MATCH · 03

Your third match, and the last of the top three. Worth reading even if the first two landed better, since it often isolates what you actually want.

Design Sprint Facilitator

Own company / boutique practice

🕒 MATCH · 84%

🏠 AI · HIGH

🚀 READY NOW

👁 Overview

A design sprint facilitator runs intensive multi-day workshops where cross-functional teams solve a specific business problem and test a prototype, compressed into days instead of months.

☰ What you'll actually do

- Facilitate live sprints. Run multi-day workshops using your AJ&Smart certification, the credential you already hold and haven't fully monetized.
- Design workshop agendas. Build digital boards and structure exercises that channel your love of "a strategy deck that made a room go quiet."
- Recruit test participants. Line up user testing sessions, using the interview-scheduling instincts from your 30+ interviews-a-year research programme.
- Manage your own pipeline. Pitch, propose, and scope follow-on work directly with client leadership, no account team buffer.

You've already said this kind of work lets you learn new skills and push into new territory, which lines up with your stated interest in developing strategic planning and creative innovation capability, but here you'd be the one setting the curriculum, not attending someone else's workshop.

🧩 Why this role fits you

This role isolates the exact ingredient that made your Brand Strategist years your best: the room, the live problem-solving, the tangible outcome by Friday. It extends your 8/10 Brand Strategist pattern more directly than any other option, stripping away the account management and client retainer overhead and leaving just the facilitation itself, the part you're certified in and clearly energized by.

It also answers your autonomy value directly. As a solo practitioner you control your calendar, which matters given your partner's nursing shifts and your non-negotiable need for flexible hours. Sprint-based work means intense delivery weeks followed by open prep weeks, a rhythm few employee roles can offer.

⚠ The Reality Check

- ⚠ Client acquisition never stops. As a solo facilitator, you are the pipeline. There's no account team booking your calendar, every quiet week is your job to fill, and your discomfort with self-promotion (not previously tested in your career) will get real pressure here.

⚠ Live sprint days are physically demanding. Multi-day facilitation with dominant, skeptical executives requires sustained high energy and room control. Your harmony-seeking conflict style needs deliberate override in these rooms, conceding to the loudest voice derails a sprint.

⚠ Income has no floor early on. Boutique practice means variable, lumpy engagements while you build a reputation and referral network, distinct from the steady consulting cadence of an agency role.

The practical stuff

Money: Day rates typically £800-£1,800 depending on client size, translating to an annual range of roughly £48,000-£90,000 at moderate utilization. This can exceed your £50k-75k bracket in strong years, but expect the first 6-12 months to run below it while you build a client base, income variability is real and needs a cash buffer given your London mortgage.

Schedule: High-intensity delivery weeks alternating with flexible prep and business-development weeks. This is the closest match to your non-negotiable flexible-hours requirement of any option here.

Energy: High-intensity social bursts during sprints, then low-contact solo weeks. This actually suits your "somewhat energized, with a limit" profile well, since the limit gets a built-in recovery week rather than daily depletion.

Growth: Can scale into a small facilitation agency with a roster of contractors, or pivot into fractional Head of Product Innovation work.

How AI will impact this role

Substantial. AI increasingly handles workshop prep logistics, agenda templates, and synthesis write-ups after the sprint. The live facilitation itself, reading a room, managing dominant personalities, keeping momentum, stays entirely human and becomes your clearer differentiator as routine prep work gets automated.

Future-proof skills

- Automate your admin: Use AI for agenda drafts, participant recruitment emails, and post-sprint synthesis docs, freeing more hours for billable facilitation.
- Build a facilitator brand: Publish opinionated takes on sprint methodology to compress your client acquisition cycle, since referrals alone won't fill a solo calendar fast enough.

Alignment with your ambitions

This satisfies your short-term goal of building new skills (business development, solo practice management) you haven't needed before. But your long-term ambition centers on significant societal contribution and possibly running a research studio, and pure sprint facilitation is narrower than that vision. At 38 with a mortgage, treat this as a viable path in its own right or a proving ground for solo consulting, not automatically a stepping stone to your dream job.

CAREER MAP

Where the matches sit

Your roles plotted by match strength against AI-exposure risk. Sweet spot is top-left; bottom-right is the walk-away zone.

- 1 Service Designer
- 2 Employee Experience Consultant
- 3 Design Sprint Facilitator
- 4 Behavioural Communications Consultant
- 5 Product Marketing Consultant
- 6 Founder, Qualitative Research Studio

For further details regarding this graph, consult your dashboard.

🏆 RUNNER-UP CAREERS · 3 ROLES

Close alternatives to your top three. Also strong fits for your strengths and values, but differing in focus, work environment or trajectory. A comparison set rather than the creative picks.

Behavioural Communications Consultant

Large (201-1000) / Agency / Consultancy

🔄 MATCH · 81%

🤖 AI · MODERATE

📈 UPSKILL

👁 Overview

You'd apply psychology and "nudge" theory to help clients craft communications that actually change behaviour, mixing research, workshops, and campaign strategy for a range of client accounts.

🧩 Why this role fits you

Your specialised knowledge of "how people actually make buying decisions" is basically behavioural science by another name, so this is a near-literal translation of what you already do. It didn't crack Top 3 because it's a lateral career pivot into a formal discipline, not an extension of your marketing track record, meaning more relearning than the others.

👍 What works for you

- 👉 Plays to your gift. Your talent for spotting the story a company tells itself maps directly onto behavioural diagnosis. 📌 Team-based, not solo. High colleague interaction with creatives and analysts suits your small-team preference. 📌 Intellectually fresh. New frameworks (COM-B, EAST) satisfy your growth and novelty appetite.

⚠ The Reality Check

- ⚠ Reskilling required. You'd need formal grounding in behavioural frameworks — a certification (6-12 months part-time) rather than a full degree, and AI-assisted learning can speed this up. 📌 Starts you at consultant level. Entering a new discipline at 38 with 15 years elsewhere may mean a lateral title, not a leadership one, initially. 📌 Client skepticism is real. You'd spend energy convincing traditional creative teams to trust counter-intuitive recommendations.

📁 The practical stuff

Money: £52,000 - £80,000 (London)

Schedule: Standard agency hours, surges around pitches

Energy: High client and colleague interaction

🤖 How AI will impact this role

Moderate — AI speeds up research synthesis and message testing; your strategic framing and ethical judgment stay central. Fits your "moderately familiar" AI comfort well.

🛡 Future-proof skills

- Behavioural framework fluency: Get certified in COM-B or EAST within a year to legitimise your existing intuition.

- AI-assisted testing: Use AI tools to run message experiments faster, freeing you for framing and client advisory.

Product Marketing Consultant

Own Company / Boutique

 MATCH · 80%

 AI · MODERATE

 REFRAME

Overview

An independent advisor helping companies sharpen their product positioning and go-to-market plans, working engagement by engagement rather than as a permanent employee.

Why this role fits you

Your 8/10 agency years ran on exactly this rhythm: new client problem, workshop, positioning deck, repeat. This gets you back there. It's not Top 3 because going independent means building your own pipeline — sales work you've never had to do, and a real gap from the security of a salaried leadership role.

What works for you

- ✓ Restores your happiest pattern. Fresh problems every few weeks instead of dashboards and forecasting. Full autonomy. You frame engagements and methodology yourself, matching your preference for delegated trust. Direct impact visibility. You'd see GTM strategy convert straight into client revenue, unlike your current buried-in-reporting role.

The Reality Check

- ⚠ Income variability. Freelance/fractional work means feast-or-famine pipeline cycles — a real shift from a stable salary with a London mortgage. Client acquisition is unavoidable. Sales and pitching aren't optional here, and it's a muscle you haven't built. Solo admin time. Business administration between engagements cuts against your dislike of solo, self-directed work.

The practical stuff

Money: £55,000 - £100,000 (variable, utilization-dependent)

Schedule: Flexible but engagement-driven

Energy: High client interaction, lower internal collegiality

How AI will impact this role

Moderate — AI drafts research and competitive intel; your differentiation strategy and executive relationships remain the value. Manageable given your current AI comfort.

Future-proof skills

- Pipeline-building: Start building a referral network now, before leaving salaried security, to de-risk the income gap.

- AI-spiced research: Use AI for first-pass competitive analysis so you spend billable hours on positioning, your real edge.

Founder, Qualitative Research Studio

Own Company / Boutique

 MATCH · 80%

 AI · MODERATE

 RETRAIN

Overview

You'd build and run your own boutique consultancy doing deep ethnographic and qualitative research, helping organisations understand the people they serve, then turning that into strategy for clients.

Why this role fits you

This is your stated dream job, almost word for word, and it channels the customer-insight programme you built that product teams now trust more than marketing. It sits below Top 3 because founding a studio means real capital and income risk upfront, a heavier lift than a role that lets you plug in more immediately.

What works for you

- Literally your dream job. Running a research studio helping organisations understand their people is what you told us you want. Total autonomy. Complete control over methodology and client selection, matching your love of delegated trust. Builds on proven strength. Your 30+ interviews/year insight programme already proves you can do this at scale.

The Reality Check

- Capital and runway. Founder path_type means unpredictable cash flow before profitability — plan for 12-18 months of variable income against your mortgage. Validation is on you. You'd need to prove studio viability through real client contracts, not assumptions, before it feels safe. Business development never stops. Constant pitching sits uneasily with your "avoid solo, sales-heavy work" instinct, even with a team.

The practical stuff

Money: £50,000 - £105,000 (variable, early years lower)

Schedule: Multi-year build, intense early phase

Energy: Very high client interaction, variable team size

How AI will impact this role

Moderate — AI handles transcription and coding, but your ethnographic depth and executive trust remain the studio's differentiator.

Future-proof skills

- Founder-led sales: Build pitching confidence deliberately, since this is the one skill standing between you and your dream job.

- AI-augmented ops: Use AI to run transcription and coding at scale so you and contractors focus purely on insight and client trust.

💡 OUTSIDE-THE-BOX CAREERS · 3 ROLES

Sometimes the best paths are not the obvious ones. These roles fit who you are but probably were not on your radar.

Museum Interpretation Manager

Medium (51-200) / Nonprofit

AI · MODERATE

REFRAME

👁 Overview

You'd shape how a museum or heritage site translates its collections and archives into narratives visitors actually connect with, working across curatorial, education, and visitor-experience teams. The job is equal parts audience research, script writing for exhibits and tours, and testing what lands with real people before it goes live.

🧩 Why this might be a fit

This pulls on the exact muscle your profile names as your real asset: making messy material legible to people, applied to objects and history instead of products. It's a genuine field change (heritage/culture, not corporate marketing) while still giving you workshops, stakeholder rooms, and visible storytelling authority, and it sits far from spreadsheets or pipeline defense.

Heads-up: heritage sector salaries often land at the lower end of your £50-75k range, especially outside national institutions.

🔗 Path Type & Reality

Employee role: expect a competitive but not brutal hiring process, usually via a formal application and portfolio/case-study interview rather than networked hustle.

🤖 AI Impact on this role

Moderate. AI can help draft label copy or synthesize visitor feedback, but deciding what story a collection tells and how to make it land emotionally with a live audience stays a human judgment call.

Athlete Wellbeing and Development Manager

Medium (51-200) / Nonprofit

 AI · MINIMAL

 UPSKILL

Overview

You'd support athletes (at a sports club, national governing body, or university programme) through career transitions, personal development, and life-outside-sport planning, working alongside coaches and performance staff. It's part programme design, part one-on-one guidance, part building the structures that don't naturally exist in performance-obsessed environments.

Why this might be a fit

Your long-distance hiking points to a genuine pull toward endurance and physical discipline, and your track record of building durable programmes (the customer-interview programme) plus your reflective, people-first listening style is unusually rare inside sports organisations, which tend to be heavy on performance data and light on human development structure. It's a real sector pivot away from marketing entirely, keeps you in rooms with people rather than dashboards, and lets your sense-making skill build something that outlasts you.

Heads-up: entry into this niche often starts below your target range, particularly outside elite/pro tier organisations.

Path Type & Reality

Employee role: hiring cycles run through sports organisations and universities, often requiring some relevant certification (e.g. career transition or coaching-adjacent credentials) to be taken seriously by a recruiter.

AI Impact on this role

Minimal to Moderate. This work depends on trust, presence, and reading a person in a vulnerable moment, which AI can support with resources but cannot replace.

Editorial Director, Podcast/Audio Documentary Studio

Startup / Media

 AI · MODERATE

 UPSKILL

Overview

You'd lead the editorial vision and narrative arc for a slate of nonfiction audio or documentary projects, working with producers and researchers to shape raw interview material into a story that holds an audience. This is a step toward, but genuinely distinct from, your named dream job: it's the editorial/leadership layer of documentary-adjacent work rather than the hands-on producer role itself.

Why this might be a fit

Your fifteen years of turning "what people do" into a story an organization can act on is precisely the skill an editorial director applies to raw interview tape instead of a brand brief. It moves you into a creative industry identity shift out of corporate marketing entirely, keeps you in a room with collaborators rather than working solo, and gives you narrative authority without requiring you to become a technical audio producer from scratch.

Heads-up: independent studios and mid-size production houses often pay below your target range at entry level; senior editorial roles at established studios can close the gap.

Path Type & Reality

Employee role at a small studio to start, with freelance editorial/story-consulting work as a realistic add-on once you've built a portfolio of credits.

AI Impact on this role

Moderate. AI speeds up transcription and rough-cut assembly, but shaping which parts of a person's story matter and why is the editorial judgment that keeps this role human-led.

✨ YOUR DREAM JOBS · 2 ROLES

You told us your dream job without worrying about constraints, and that was deliberate. Here we put the constraints back in: not to talk you out of it, but to show what getting there would really take, and what a version of it might look like that fits the experience you already have.

Documentary Producer

AI · MODERATE

RETRAIN

👁 Overview

Emma, this dream makes total sense on paper: it's the purest version of what you already do, turning what people say and do into a story that lands, minus the corporate wrapper. The catch is that "documentary producer" as an entry point looks nothing like your current seniority, pay, or stability, even though the underlying craft is identical.

🔄 Feasibility Rating

Low - Moderate: The craft fit is excellent, but the entry-level path (freelance, unpaid development, festival-circuit grind) would mean a steep income and status reset from where you sit today.

👤 Personality & Energy Fit

- Your "Somewhat Energized" social battery suits documentary work's collaborative shoots and edit-room debates, but the isolated, self-directed stretches of development and fundraising sit right in your stated avoidance zone (solo, research-heavy work).
- Your deadline-aware pace and preference for some process work against the unpredictable, often unstructured commissioning and funding cycles typical of documentary production.
- The novelty here is real fuel against your "Competence Trap", but the years of underpaid, precarious grind before any stability could easily tip your perfectionism into burnout rather than relief.

👑 The "Executive Version" Suggestion

- Rather than a hands-on Producer role, target Executive Producer or Series Editor at an established documentary or factual studio, someone who shapes narrative arc and greenlights stories rather than chasing funding reel by reel.
- This solves the low-salary, low-stimulus risk of ground-level production work: it uses your stakeholder management and story-synthesis skills at a strategic altitude, with a team around you instead of you doing every job at once.
- This exact version showed up in your Out of Box list as Editorial Director, Podcast/Audio Documentary Studio, which is a strong validation that this instinct is worth pursuing through that door rather than the traditional producer ladder.

📡 Industry Outlook & Regional Trends

- UK and Northern European factual/documentary roles at editorial or executive producer level typically land £45k-£70k at mid-size studios, with entry-level producer or researcher roles often starting well below £35k.
- AI Impact: Moderate. AI speeds up transcription, rough cuts, and archive search, but deciding which human story matters and how to shape it emotionally stays firmly a human judgment call.

- The UK has a genuinely strong indie documentary and streaming-commissioned factual sector, but it's competitive and heavily network-driven, meaning your existing stakeholder relationships matter more than a formal credential here.

Future-proof skills

- Your ability to find "the one sentence that makes a messy thing make sense" is exactly the editorial judgment AI can't replicate, that's your differentiator in every pitch room.
- Build fluency in AI-assisted rough-cut and research tools now, so you can direct a leaner production team rather than be replaced by one.

Steps for Pursuing This Role

- Test the dream at low stakes: shadow or assist on a short documentary or branded-content film project through your existing agency or industry contacts before quitting anything.
- No gating credential exists for this field (no licence required), so your CIM Diploma and MA in Strategic Communication are relevant background, not a barrier; a short factual filmmaking or story-editing course would speed credibility, not gate entry.
- Build a portfolio career bridge: keep marketing consulting or freelance brand strategy work part-time while you build documentary credits, so the mortgage doesn't depend on festival acceptance.

Heads-up: entry-level documentary production income sits well below your £50k-£75k target; the Executive Producer / Series Editor path is the realistic way to close that gap.

Founder, Research Studio (Human-Centred Insight)

 AI · MODERATE

 REFRAME

Overview

This is the dream job that most directly matches your actual daily superpower, Emma: turning qualitative human research into a story an organisation can act on. Unlike documentary work, this one doesn't require you to leave your existing network, skills, or client base behind; it's a natural extension of what you already do inside your current job, just unbundled and run on your own terms.

Feasibility Rating

Moderate - High: You already have the core skillset (30+ interviews a year, customer-insight programme built from scratch) and the credibility; what's missing is the business infrastructure of running your own shop, not the craft itself.

Personality & Energy Fit

- Running a studio (even a small one) means client-facing collaboration and small-team structure, which fits your "Somewhat Energized" social profile and your stated need to avoid solo, isolated work far better than solo documentary filmmaking would.
- Your preference for delegated autonomy and comfort with risk align well with founder life, though your deadline-aware pacing means you'll need to build in structure since there's no external boss setting the clock.

- This path directly interrupts your Competence Trap: instead of doing the same job "with your eyes closed," you're rebuilding the skill from the ground up in a context that actually excites you, which is a real burnout antidote rather than just a change of scenery.

The "Executive Version" Suggestion

- The Executive Version of this dream is already the dream: Founder of a boutique qualitative research studio, positioned to serve mid-size B2B or fintech clients (your exact former world), commanding senior consulting rates rather than freelance researcher rates.
- This solves the low-income risk of solo freelance research by building a studio model (you plus a small associate network), letting you sell strategic insight engagements rather than billing hourly as a lone contractor.
- This appeared directly in your runner-up list as "Founder, Qualitative Research Studio" (rank 6, compatibility 80), which confirms the algorithm sees the same fit you feel; it's your named dream job validated independently.

Industry Outlook & Regional Trends

- Independent qualitative research/insight consultants in the UK and Netherlands/Germany typically bill £500-£900/day once established; a studio with 2-3 repeat clients can realistically clear £70k-£100k within 2-3 years.
- AI Impact: Moderate. AI can transcribe and summarise interviews fast, but clients pay for the synthesis, the "which story is this company telling itself" judgment call, which stays human and is actually your premium differentiator against cheaper AI-only research tools.
- Demand is real but the market is crowding with AI-assisted research tools promising faster insights; your edge is positioning as the strategic sense-maker, not a data collector, especially selling into fintech/scale-up clients you already understand.

Future-proof skills

- Your specialised knowledge of how people actually make decisions versus what they claim is a genuinely rare, hard-to-automate asset; lead with that as your studio's core positioning, not "research services" generically.
- Get fluent enough in AI transcription/synthesis tools to offer clients a faster, leaner engagement than traditional agencies, using AI as your junior analyst rather than your competitor.

Steps for Pursuing This Role

- Test this at low stakes now: offer one paid pilot research engagement to a former colleague's company or your own network while still employed, to validate demand and pricing.
- No gating credential blocks this field; your CIM Diploma, MA in Strategic Communication, and Design Sprint certification (AJ&Smart) already give you strong, credible positioning, so this is a go-to-market problem, not a retraining one.
- Bridge financially with a portfolio approach: keep one part-time consulting retainer (positioning/brand strategy, close to your current skill set) running while you build the studio's first 2-3 clients.

FROM YOUR CONVERSATION

Discussion Highlights

What came out of talking it through with your coach. These are the points where something shifted: a pattern you named, a correction you made, or a conclusion the two of you reached together. Your own words shaped the report you have just read.

- Diagnostic-layer CV rewrite. You should stop leading with “Senior Marketing Manager” and instead put a line under it like “I turn conflicting customer signals into a story an organization can act on,” then rewrite achievements from execution language into diagnosis language, for example “identified that product and sales were serving different customer models, built the interview programme that surfaced it.”
- Use the “proximity to the story” filter in every career decision. The coach reframed your best years as being close enough to the story to shape it in real time, and said your satisfaction tracks proximity to narrative and pace of iteration more than title, budget, or scope.
- Install an external stopping point before you start. Your loop was named as “the bar never gets marked as met,” so the fix is to pre-name a check-in person or moment who can declare something done, because your internal signal for “good enough” does not reliably fire.
- Treat the Head of Marketing offer as a bigger version of the same underperforming shape. The coach framed it as fintech again, just with a promotion attached, and said a yes would mostly buy you title and surface area, not more impact, more growth, or more autonomy, unless you deliberately want it as a bridge.
- Use the agency pod as the structural fix for your harmony bias. In service design consulting, your risk is conceding ground too early to a CFO-type voice, so the offer-stage question is whether you’d have a design director or engagement lead in the room to hold scope and rigor, rather than being the most senior voice yourself.
- Ask agencies how pitch weeks are actually staffed. Before accepting any consultancy role, ask whether pitch duty rotates or pulls the whole pod, and ask what the real pitch cadence was over the last two quarters, because “hybrid-friendly” does not protect your two evenings by six if pitch weeks are unmanaged.
- Use a short practitioner certificate, not a retraining path. For service design, the coach said the gap is “Upskill,” not “Retrain,” and recommended shadowing 2-3 live projects plus a short certification to get fluent in roughly 2-3 months, with UK options around £1,000-£2,500 for evening/weekend formats.
- Do not mistake solo sprint facilitation for a job, it is a business. The coach pushed back hard that Design Sprint Facilitator is 20% facilitation and 80% sales, proposals, client management, and empty-week risk, with year-one income from zero pipeline more like £15,000-£30,000 than the headline range.
- Use the research studio as the real dream-job bridge. The coach said you already have the craft for a qualitative research studio, what you lack is the business infrastructure, and suggested testing it with one paid pilot while keeping a part-time consulting retainer to bridge income.

Saved Responses

Saved response 1

That's a real thing to have named, and it's worth sitting with for a second rather than rushing past it.

The agency years worked because you were close enough to the story to shape it in real time: pitching it, testing it, watching a room's reaction and adjusting on the spot. Fintech gave you the remit but moved you further from that loop, into a structure where the story gets shaped by committee, timeline, and compliance before it ever reaches you. More scope, less proximity. That's why it read as smaller even though every external marker said bigger.

It also explains the split in your conflict style. You push hard on ideas when you're close enough to the story to feel it's yours to defend. You concede faster on relationship friction because the story isn't the thing at stake there. Same person, different stakes.

Worth flagging for later: this is likely going to be a real filter for you when we get into career options, proximity to narrative and pace of iteration matters more to your satisfaction than title or budget. Something to keep in mind as we go.

Ready to move on to strengths, or anything else you want to dig into here first?

Saved response 2

Fair catch on the hiking, and worth naming clearly: that's a real miss, not a mild one, the whole appeal you're describing is that nobody needs anything from you on that trail, and the Athlete Wellbeing role is built entirely on being needed by someone in a vulnerable moment. Wrong read on what the hobby is for you.

On the museum salary heads-up, you're right to read the subtext. "Often lands at the lower end of your £50-75k range, especially outside national institutions" is doing polite work for "expect closer to £50k unless you land at the British Museum or a major national trust site." Regional and mid-size heritage orgs frequently sit below that, sometimes £38-45k for a manager-level role, because the sector runs on grant funding and trust income, not commercial margins.

On the podcast studio, here's the honest gap. Editorial Director means shaping story arc and structure, which is your actual skill and transfers cleanly. But it's not the documentary dream job itself, it's one removed: you'd rarely be the one sitting with a subject building trust and pulling the tape, producers do that, and the editorial layer works from what they bring back. It's closer to being the strategist behind the storytellers than being the storyteller. Not a consolation prize (the narrative authority is real and it's a genuine industry change), but call it a "get you inside the building" role rather than the dream job itself. Whether that's satisfying probably depends on how much you need the hands-on interview part versus the shaping-into-story part.

Want me to flag these three reactions and move on, or keep going on any of them?

Also flagged by you

Head of Marketing decision is due by the end of the quarter. Two evenings a week at home by six is a condition, not a preference.

THAT IS THE REPORT

You know where you stand.

Revisit this report whenever you need to. You can also share it with mentors, a career advisor, or anyone else who can support your next steps.

ALSO ON YOUR ACCOUNT

Three tools, and your money back

Your assessment comes with a toolkit that opens up as you invite people. Every friend who joins gets 25% off, and each one you bring advances you one step:

-  Find Job Openings 1 friend
Search live job openings matched to your top career recommendations.
-  Tailor Your Resume 2 friends
Rewrite your uploaded resume to fit the specific jobs you want to apply for.
-  Tailor Cover Letters 3 friends
Generate a tailored cover letter for each role, written to the specific posting.
-  25% refund 4 friends
Get a quarter of what you paid back to your card.
-  Additional 25% refund 5 friends
Another quarter back — now half your purchase recovered.
-  Remaining 50% refund 6 friends
The final half back. Your assessment is now completely free.

Six friends and the assessment has cost you nothing. Refunds go back to the card you paid with.

Everything lives on your dashboard at cairnly.io/dashboard